Saké Terminology

SEIMAIBUAI : "THE PERCENT OF THE REMAINING GRAIN SIZE"

Perhaps one of the most dependable ways to determine a saké's qualities and characteristics, from which the most useful generalizations and predictions can be drawn. This is because in general, the more the rice has been milled, the more refined and elegant the final flavor profile. Expressed as a percentage, with the actually number referring to the size of the grains after milling, or "polished", compared to their pre-milling size.

HONJOZO **

A category of premium saké made from rice, kōji, water, and distilled alcohol, with a polishing rate of 70% or less.

GINJO **

A category of premium saké made from rice, kōji, water, and distilled alcohol, with a polishing rate of 60% or less.

DAIGINJO **

A category of premium saké made from rice, kōji, water, and distilled alcohol, with a polishing rate of 50% or less. This is the highest grade of saké.

 Adding a small amount of alcohol to the stage of the moromi, just before it is pressed to separate the saké from the lees (non-fermentable rice solids remaining in the sake). This is not just a matter of increasing yields; it can lighten the flavor, making a saké a bit more drinkable/enjoyable, in the opinion of many. Also, adding a bit of alcohol at that precise stage tends to pull out more fragrant and flavorful components from the moromi when pressing, as many of them are soluble in alcohol. This pure, distilled alcohol usually comes from distillers specializing in its production.

JUNMAI : PURE RICE SAKÉ

Nothing is used in its production except rice, water, and kōji. Saké that is not labeled 'Junmai' (or have the word 'Junmai' somewhere on the bottle) will have pure, distilled alcohol added in varying amounts, as well as possibly sugar and organic acids. The designation 'Junmai' further requires that the rice used in brewing be milled, or polished, so that no more than 70% of the original size of the grain remains, hopefully ensuring that certain degree of "smoothness" will result in the final product. Junmai saké is generally a bit heavier, and fuller in flavor than other types of saké, and often the acidity is a bit higher.

GENSHU : UNDILUTED SAKÉ

Before bottling and shipping, pure water is usually added to sake to adjust the alcohol content from the naturally occurring 20% or so, down to about 16%. Genshu saké is saké to which water has NOT been added.

KŌJI : "THE MAGIC MOLD"

Kōji is not actually a yeast, but a mold (Latin name: Aspergillus oryzae). It is used in saké production to break down starches in steamed rice into fermentable sugars. This naturally occurring culture is particularly prevalent in Japan, where it is known as kōji-kin, which explains why so many Japanese foods have been developed over the centuries using it. It is also used to make popular foods like soy sauce, miso, and mirin.

NAMA : UNPASTEURIZED SAKÉ

Saké usually goes through two pasteurizations: the first is performed after pressing and before storage; the second, prior to bottling and shipping. Sake which only goes through the first pasteurization is called 'Nama-Zume'. The opposite type of sake which skips the first and only goes through the second pasteurization is called 'Nama-Chozo'. A saké that has been shipped in a completely unpasteurized state is simply called 'Nama-Zaké' or 'Nama'. The flavor of nama saké is somewhat fresher, and livelier than its pasteurized counterpart. How "overpowering" this attribute is varies from saké to saké, depending a great deal on how the saké was processed and stored after having been brewed.

MOROMI

Fermentation mash consisting of shubo (fermentation starter), kōji, steamed rice, and water.

MUROKA

A saké that has been fined with charcoal.

NIGORI : "CLOUDY"

When the moromi is ready to be pressed into saké, the white rice solids that did not ferment, (the saké kasu, the lees of the process) are separated from the clear or slightly-amber fresh nihonshu. The saké kasu is left in by using a very coarse mesh, or large-holed filter. Alternatively, some of it can be actually be added back to clear saké. Nigori saké can be found in all consistencies, from only slightly murky, to chunky enough to eat with a fork, with flavors all over the map: some are sweet, many are quite tart.

TOKUBETSU (JUNMAI & HONJOZO) : "SPECIAL"

A "special brewing method" can exempt a brewer from needing to meet a certain polish ratio for Tokubetsu saké varieties. For example: a Tokubetsu Junmai with a 65% polish ratio, but is later pressed from a traditional wooden tank, called a kibune. This qualifies as a "special brewing method", and the saké can be labeled 'Tokubetsu' despite its polish ratio falling short. The term 'Tokubetsu' can also apply when a saké's ingredients are clearly distinct from those of a regular Junmai or Honjozo. Take, for instance, a brewery making Junmai saké using standard cooking rice with a polishing ratio of 70%. If this brewery developed a saké with the same polishing ratio using a high-quality saké rice, such as Yamadanishiki, the saké could be labeled as a 'Tokubetsu Junmai' due to the clear difference in materials compared to their standard Junmai. In these instances, the caveat is that the brewer must clearly label what makes the saké distinct. In this case, the brewer would specify "100% Yamada Nishiki".

YAMAHAI

A traditional way of making saké where, rather than adding lactic acid to deter microbes and bacteria from spoiling the fermentation, no lactic acid is added and thus the saké is left to ferment naturally.

TAKACHIYO 59 SERIES : JUNMAI GINJO

Established in 1871 in Minamiuonuma, in the Niigata Prefecture. With its prized pristine water source from the Echigo Mountains to the north, Takachiyo Shuzo has been producing some of Japan's most prized sake for over 150 years.

Amongst their production is the 59 Series, highlighting the diversity of rice strains presented as a Single Rice Chapter, or blends of Chapters. All expressions are brewed with rice milled to 59% seimaibuai (remaining grain size) produced with the same kobo (yeast), and bottled nama (unpasteurized) to maintain vibrancy.

The results are breathtaking, with powerful aromas, rich viscosity, and a generous delivery with purity, high energy, and a touch of sweetness that makes them an ideal food pairing.

NIKKA WHISKY
THE NIKKA WHISKY DISTILLING CO.,LTD.

Founded in 1934 by Masataka Taketsuru, the father of Japanese whisky, Nikka Whisky blends tradition with innovation. Taketsuru, trained in Scotland, established Yoichi Distillery on Hokkaido, where the cold, coastal climate and coal-fired pot stills produce smoky, peated, oak-forward whiskies reminiscent of classic Scottish malts. In 1969, he founded the Miyagikyo Distillery on Honshu, where larger stills and indirect steam heating create lighter, fruitier, and more floral expressions. Today, Nikka masterfully combines these distinct styles, solidifying its status as a cornerstone of Japanese whisky craftsmanship.

SUNTORY サントリーハウス THE YAMAZAKI THE CHITA THE HAKUSHU

THE HOUSE OF SUNTORY The Nature and Spirit of Japan

Founded in 1923 by Shinjiro Torii, the House of Suntory pioneered Japanese whisky with the establishment of the Yamazaki Distillery, Japan's first malt whisky distillery, near Kyoto. Inspired by Scottish traditions but crafted for Japanese palates, Yamazaki whisky is known for its complex, multi-layered character with fruity and spicy notes. In 1973, Suntory expanded with the Hakushu Distillery, nestled in the Japanese Alps. Surrounded by pristine forests and pure mountain water, Hakushu produces light, herbal, and crisp whiskies, contrasting with Yamazaki's depth. Suntory also operates the Chita Distillery on the Pacific coast, specializing in delicate, smooth grain whiskies that serve as the backbone for many of its blends.

ICHIRO'S MALT 秩父蒸溜所 THE CHICHIBU

Founded by Ichiro Akuto, Chichibu Distillery is located in Saitama, about two hours west of Tokyo. Akuto, from a family with a rich sake and whisky heritage, built Chichibu with a focus on traditional craftsmanship and innovation. The distillery stands out for its in-house cooperage and floor malting facility, ensuring meticulous control over production. It is also the only distillery in the world to use 100% Mizunara Japanese oak washbacks, imparting a unique depth to its whisky. Despite its young age, Chichibu has gained global acclaim for its complex, small-batch single malts.

KURAYOSHI 倉吉

Kurayoshi Distillery, owned by Matsui Shuzou, is located in Tottori Prefecture and is known for producing Kurayoshi and Matsui whiskies. Though Matsui Shuzou has a history in sake and shochu production dating back over a century, it expanded into whisky in recent years. Kurayoshi whiskies are crafted using pure volcanic rock-filtered water from the Tottori region, giving them a clean and smooth character. The distillery produces both single malts and blended whiskies, including San-In, a lighter, accessible whisky reflecting the region's natural purity. While initially blending imported and domestic whisky, Kurayoshi has increasingly focused on producing its own distinctive Japanese whisky, gaining global recognition for its balanced and refined expressions.

FUYU 冬

Fuyu Whisky is not produced at a single distillery but is a blended Japanese whisky brand crafted from whiskies sourced from multiple distilleries across Japan. The brand, whose name means “winter” in Japanese, was created to showcase a rich, balanced expression of Japanese whisky.

While details about its production remain limited, Fuyu Whisky is known for using malt and grain whiskies aged in oak barrels, often highlighting flavors of dried fruit, spice, and subtle smoke. It is primarily blended and bottled for export markets, offering an accessible introduction to Japanese whisky.

MARS 火星

THE SHINSHU

THE TSUNUKI

Mars Whisky, owned by Hombo Shuzo, has a long history in Japanese spirits, dating back to its origins as a shochu producer in 1872. The company ventured into whisky in the 1940s, guided by Kiichiro Iwai, an early mentor to Masataka Taketsuru. In 1985, Mars established Shinshu Distillery in the Nagano Alps, Japan’s highest whisky distillery, where the cool climate and pure mountain water contribute to its smooth, elegant whisky profile. After a temporary closure in the 1990s due to low demand, Shinshu reopened in 2011, reviving Mars Whisky’s production. To experiment with different aging conditions, Mars opened Tsunuki Distillery in 2016, located in Kagoshima’s warmer, coastal climate. This contrast allows Mars to produce a diverse range of expressions, solidifying its reputation in Japanese whisky craftsmanship.

FUKANO 深野

The Fukano Distillery has been producing traditional shochu since its founding in 1823. While primarily a shochu distillery, Fukano later ventured into whisky by aging its rice-based spirit in oak casks, creating a distinctive fusion of Japanese whisky and shochu craftsmanship.

Fukano whiskies are known for their silky texture, delicate sweetness, and unique flavor profiles, influenced by their rice-based mash and diverse barrel aging, including sherry, brandy, and Mizunara oak casks. Though not a traditional grain or malt whisky producer, Fukano has gained international recognition for its innovative, limited-edition releases that showcase a different side of Japanese whisky.

KIKORI きこり

Kikori Whisky was founded in 2015 by Ann Soh Woods, making it one of the newer Japanese whisky brands. Unlike most traditional Japanese whiskies made from barley, Kikori is crafted from 100% locally grown rice, giving it a uniquely smooth and light character. Distilled in Kumamoto, Japan, Kikori is aged for at least three years in a combination of American, French, and sherry casks, resulting in a delicate balance of vanilla, caramel, and floral notes. Its rice-based spirit and soft, clean profile make it a versatile whisky, often enjoyed neat or in cocktails.

OHISHI 大石

Founded in 1872, Ohishi Distillery is a family-owned producer located in Kumamoto, Japan, originally specializing in shochu. Unlike most Japanese whisky distilleries that use malted barley, Ohishi primarily crafts whisky from rice, specifically local and fragrant strains like mochi rice. The distillery ages its whisky in a variety of casks, including ex-sherry and brandy casks, which impart rich, layered flavors. Situated near the Kuma River, Ohishi benefits from pure, soft water, enhancing the smoothness of its whisky. Though relatively new to the global whisky scene, Ohishi has gained recognition for its unique rice-based expressions, offering a distinct and elegant take on Japanese whisky craftsmanship.

EIGASHIMA 江井ヶ島

The Eigashima Distillery, also known as The White Oak Distillery, is one of Japan's oldest family-run distilleries, with roots in sake and shochu production since 1888. It became the first Japanese company to obtain a whisky license in 1919, though full-scale whisky production began in 1984. Located in Akashi, Hyogo Prefecture, near Osaka Bay, the distillery benefits from a warm coastal climate, shaping its light and delicate whisky expressions. As a small-scale operation, whisky is traditionally distilled seasonally, though increased demand has extended production. Despite producing just 48,000L annually, Eigashima upholds high artisanal standards, focusing on precision and tradition. Under the White Oak brand, Eigashima crafts single malts and blends, notably Akashi Whisky, aging them in ex-bourbon, sherry, brandy, and barley shochu casks, with specialty finishes in tequila, cognac, and wine casks. With a legacy of craftsmanship and innovation, Eigashima remains a respected pioneer in Japanese whisky artistry.

KAIYŌ 海洋

KAIYŌ

Kaiyo Whisky stands out for its innovative Mizunara oak maturation and unique ocean aging process. While its exact distillation details remain undisclosed, Kaiyo sources its whisky from Japan, aging it in rare Mizunara casks, which impart spice, coconut, and sandalwood notes. After initial aging, the whisky is sent to mature at sea, where constant motion and shifting conditions enhance its depth and smoothness. Though a relatively new brand, Kaiyo has gained global recognition for its refined, Mizunara-influenced expressions, offering a distinctive take on Japanese whisky craftsmanship.

THE AKKESHI 大石

Founded in 2016 in Hokkaido, the Akkeshi Distillery draws inspiration from Scotland's Islay region, crafting bold, smoky whiskies with a Japanese touch. Located in a coastal, misty climate, it employs peat and Mizunara oak casks, enhancing its distinctive character. Using Forsyths copper pot stills and aging in bourbon, sherry, wine, and Mizunara casks, Akkeshi follows Scottish-style whisky-making traditions, with maritime conditions enriching its rich, complex flavors.
